EDWARD ADRIAN STRICKLAND & MARIA REBEGILA

SERVITE DOMINUM IN TIMORE

As we continue to reap the fruits of Christ's glorious resurrection, let us continue our reflection on the virtues. Christ's rising from the grave obtains for us the power of transformation, such that we can more perfectly resemble Christ in our words and actions, even the inclinations of our interior life! Growth in virtue entails the cultivation of habits which orient our souls toward the good rather than toward evil. We know how easy it is to get into bad habits and get stuck in them. Virtue, by contrast, is the habit of doing good. In other words, good becomes our soul's default position—a more fundamental desire of our heart than sinful temptation.

Last week we looked at the first theological virtue of faith. Now let us consider hope. Hope orients us toward a future good, even if (especially if) that good is arduous or difficult. Our ultimate hope is to attain God, Himself. Since our hope is, beyond this world, we know that the source of this hope must be beyond this world. So, like faith, hope is an infused virtue, but we must dispose ourselves to it. Hope adds to love since hope moves us to pursue and attain the one loved.

If we are to hope, then we must be founded on faith which gives us the reasons to hope: God has sent His revelation, established the New Covenant in the Blood of His Son. He has entrusted us to the Church, the vessel of salvation. He has applied the grace of Christ to us in Baptism and the other Sacraments. He has assured us of His protection by means of the angels. He guards us from error through the unchanging magisterium taught through the ages. We know that He established the divine economy by which all men have access to sufficient grace to be saved. The faithful long-suffering of Mary, the virtues and graces of the saints bestir hope in us as well.

Hope, by definition, implies that we do not yet have the person or thing hoped for. God has designed the spiritual life in such a way for a purpose. Why doesn't God immediately grant the object of our hope? It is to allow us to experience the punishment which our sin merits, thus we know the consequences of rejecting God. The patience required to await hope's fulfillment keeps fresh in mind our need for God Who alone can fulfill our desires—which our own efforts cannot.

God gives us the Eucharist as a way to sustain hope in us; through the Holy Mass we bring to God our desires, we make our prayer to Him, and God invariably acts to fulfill our desire with Himself. Related to this reality is the fact that cultivating the virtue of hope can aid us to avoid sin. Hope motivates our resistance to sin because it tells us that God's strength offered to us in our battles is never exhausted. Sin occurs when we look to worldly things to fulfill our longings; however, hope tells us that God's direction and providence will not leave us wanting. Hope keeps heaven on our minds! It allows us to more clearly see God at work in our midst and thus grounds our joy. Joy results from the knowledge of the good we possess and the good that lies in store.

The vice of presumption harms hope within us, that is having excessive confidence in ourselves, or taking for granted the goodness of God. Despair damages our hope because it stems from the incorrect conviction that God's power and providence do not suffice. "Hail holy Queen, our life, our sweetness and our hope!" ~ Fr. O'Brien
