SERVITE DOMINUM IN TIMORE

Continue to reflect with me on the actions of the Holy Mass under the guidance of Abbé Barthe. We resume the fraction rite where the priest receives the paten from the subdeacon and fractions the Host. As stated last time, this moment of the Mass represents for us the moment of the Resurrection since Body and Blood are joined once again. Just as the two Marys come to the tomb on that first Easter Sunday, "Mary Magdalen and the other Mary," (Mt 28:1), so too can we see the deacon and subdeacon presenting an image of the pilgrimage to the tomb of our risen Lord.

During the whole of the Roman Canon, the bread (and subsequently the consecrated Host) are placed upon the linen of the corporal. Only at the fraction does the priest receive the paten and slip it beneath the Host. The paten looks like a plate, albeit one of silver and gold. The bread is placed directly upon the linen of the altar as a sign of the sacrificial dimension of the act. A sacrifice is offered upon an altar, whereas an ordinary meal appears before us upon a plate. But during the fraction, the paten has a practical function. Its duty is to retain any fragment that may fall from the broken Host. So, there is a direct connection between the presence of the paten and the reality of the breaking of the Host. Taking the metal paten, the priest might call to mind, therefore, the many priestly duties of the Old Testament whereby the priests would slay the victim with a metal knife as the victim is offered. The paten can help the priest become more aware of this office as sacrificer: he sheds the Blood of Christ, perpetuating the deed which won the salvation of the world; he thus offers his own life in union with One he now offers.

As stated before, the Agnus Dei is the chant which corresponds to the fractioning of the Host. The fact that the chant begins after the fractioning has occurred is no distraction, though. In the same way, the priest recites the entrance antiphon after he has physically entered the sanctuary. These two examples serve to elaborate on the layers of meaning and significance of the liturgical events before us. There is so much unfolding that it cannot all occur in the same span of time! The text is based on St. John's title for Christ in the Book of Revelation and found its way into the Mass roughly around the 8th century. Its three-form structure is a kind of book-end with the three-form Kyrie at the beginning of Mass. Three times calling upon Christ's mercy during the Agnus Dei reminds us of His victory over all sin: original, mortal, and venial. We can recall also our three fold need for His mercy: in our ignorance, faults and punishments.

After chanting dona nobis pacem, we return to this theme of peace in an extended prayer, Domine Jesu Christe, qui dixisti. This moment looks backward to the first prayer of the Canon, the Te igitur, when we prayed for peace. The present prayer is also the culmination of the fraction rite whereby the Host is broken over the chalice and the priest says, "Pax Domini sit semper vobiscum." Finally, now, that peace of Christ is shared among the members of the body present at Mass. The sign of peace is exchanged ceremonially when the deacon is present. Before extending the sign of peace to the deacon, the priest kisses the altar so as to make clear the font from which this peace flows. This is not an expression of mere humanism or well-wishing, but is an orderly procession where divine peace is transmitted from head to body.

Elevating this sign of peace all the more is its connection to what is about to come in the ceremony of the Mass, the Communion. Peace among the members of the Body of Christ is an expression of our unity which Christ accomplished. We see the unity of the whole body as the exchange of peace is carried out. The priest represents Christ who received peace from His Father and shared it with His apostles, represented by the deacon. The deacon then shares peace with the subdeacon who brings it to the other clergy or the servers. This represents the unity of the faithful in all times and places.

~Fr. O'Brien
